AB Dietary carotenoids of a dog-rose prepn. as well as .beta.-carotene affected humoral and cellular immunity in humans and lab. animals in a dose-dependent manner and showed a marked anticarcinogenic effect in patients with colon cancer or animals with carcinogen-induced stomach neoplasm.

AB A review with many refs. Carotenoids are pigments found in plants and microorganisms, but not synthesized in animals. Fewer than 10% of the carotenoids can function as vitamin A precursors in mammals. Carotenoids and retinoids have chem. and metabolic similarities and differences, and some overlap in biol. activities.

Carotenoids in tissues reflect food choices. Carotenoids exhibit biol. activities as antioxidants, affect cell growth regulation, and modulate gene expression and immune response.

Epidemiol. evidence links higher carotenoid intakes and tissue conchs. with reduced cancer and cardiovascular disease risk, although results from clin. trials do not support .beta.-carotene supplementation as a strategy to reduce risk. Continued research in this area is likely to stimulate better intervention strategies with clin. and public health applications.
